

went on board his ship and left her. When Ariadne awaked, and found the vessel gone, she cried sadly, and was sorry she had forsaken her father's palace, but it was too late. While she was deploring her misfortune, Bacchus, the God of wine, passed by, and Ariadne being very beautiful, he took pity on her and married her. A crown which she had upon her head, Bacchus threw up to Heaven, and it was changed into a constellation, which is still called after her name. Theseus, at his departure from home, promised his old father Egeus, that if he conquered the Minotaur, he would upon his return, put out a white flag on his ship as a signal of his success; but he forgot his promise, and his father, who, during his absence went daily to the sea-side to wait his arrival, one day saw the vessel enter the port, without a white flag, and thinking his son was dead, he threw himself into the sea and was drowned. Theseus sent presents to the god Apollo,

Apollo, to express his thanks for his success, and gave orders that the vessel should go annually with the same manner, which was observed, and no one could be till this ship returned to Athens.

Miss Julia. Theseus was a man, Mademoiselle, to leave princesses so, who had saved his

Mademoiselle. Very true, not if he had not left her in that must have married her; and chooses to marry a young runs after the men. While caution for her assistance, he makes promises in the world; but they think themselves obliged to promises which they make to they are delighted at being able to them, and make a jest of them. I told Lady Such-a-One, say that was handsome, and that I was in love of her, and she was foolish to believe me.